Story: Destiny's Journey with Skilltime

Destiny was always a bright and curious child, fascinated by everything from painting to coding. She dabbled in all kinds of activities, but as she got older, the number of choices began to feel overwhelming. There were so many subjects in school and hobbies at home that she enjoyed, but she had no idea what to focus on. That's when her teacher introduced her to Skilltime.

With Skilltime, Destiny could track how she felt about different classes and activities. It wasn't just about what she liked—it helped her understand how much effort she was putting in, how much she was learning, and how those subjects made her feel. After every class or activity, she would answer three simple questions about her experience, and Skilltime did the rest.

By analyzing her answers, Skilltime started to show patterns. It revealed that while Destiny enjoyed art and design, she was especially passionate about anything involving technology. In fact, her scores in classes like computer science and digital design were the highest. Not only did Skilltime show her what she was good at, but it also showed her potential career paths based on these interests.

As Destiny grew older, Skilltime began offering her personalized insights. It gave her three distinct choices for her future:

1. She could pursue a career in creative fields like fashion or graphic design, where her natural artistic talent would shine.
2. She could combine her love of creativity and technology by studying user experience design or game development.
3. She could follow a business-oriented path, using her skills in both creativity and communication to excel in fields like marketing or project management.

For each path, Skilltime also provided Destiny with metrics, showing her potential earnings, how happy she might be in each career, and the possible challenges (what Skilltime called “white noise”) that could get in the way.

As she prepared for college, Destiny felt empowered by the clarity that Skilltime gave her. She knew she didn't have to follow a straight path—her journey could soar along a ridge, guided by the pull of her natural strengths and interests. With Skilltime offering insights into her potential, Destiny felt ready to navigate her future with confidence, knowing exactly how to use her talents to succeed.
